Climate Emotions Facilitator II Vancouver, Britishless Collective, Canada

Hello! Here at the Experimental Museum of the Future (XMewFu), we are workshopping each day towards collectively creating a more livable world. The XMewFu is a dedicated hub for knowledge creation, highlighting the local achievements of community members, as well as ways for individuals to connect. The Library of the Emotions @XMewFu is housed in the Making Room, a quiet place to sit with our extensive collection of embodied emotions. An interview with one of our reference librarians will help you put into words what you're feeling (or maybe a new form of expressing will be born).

Job Summary:

Facilitators enable.[1] Rather than an institution, the XMewFu is based on the relationships between individuals, folks working together as a network. The team's goal is to normalize the expression of and the making space for climate emotions (ClEmo), such as climate grief, eco-anxiety, and ecological rage.[2] Historically XMewFu has provided ClEmo counselling and programming as a benefit to staff and volunteer in our spaces, but this year we are trialing expanding our reach to anyone from the community who wishes to participate. The objectives in taking on this role are to (1.) ameliorate emotional literacy; (2.) normalize climate emotions, including healthy expression; (3.) provide space for folks to reflect on their own embodied feelings around climate; (4.) provide space and programming for communities to form around shared experiences of climate-lives, enabling collective taking care of each other; (5.) provoke action, experimentation, and hope growing from that embodied place of climate distress (coordinated with the various XMewFu researches). The position is envisioned under an apprenticeship model—you are never working alone—year one you will work under the tutelage of the incumbent ClEmo Facilitator I, while year two (or final year) you will mentor the incoming one. This year's focus theme is solastalgia, the pain we feel while still in a home that is changing irrevocably around us, highlighting the everyday needs to adapt wherever we find ourselves.[3] We grapple with this, while also recognizing that so many home-places have already been distressed and disappeared by systems of colonialism and uneven power distribution.

[1] We use a broad definition of "facilitator," taken from a recent piece on adrienne maree brown's latest book, Loving Corrections: "The book draws on brown's extensive experience as a facilitator; in that role, they said, they learned how to hold a space in which people could slow down, connect as human beings, and really hear one another through sometimes difficult conversations" (Thompson, 2024).

Position Details

Posting Number	24FA0078
Position Title	Climate Emotions Facilitator II
Area	Library of the Emotions @XMewFu
Who We Are	For over 55 years, XMewFu has enabled and housed the social experiments in living of Vancouver's community. The loosely related buildings house what locals have created, with easy access to Neighbourhood Small Grants, and other crowd funding sources. XMewFu is part of the confederated program for WorkLessBC, which allows a four-day work week at your regular position, while still being paid full time—the fifth paid day is open for you to try creative ideas that have been fermenting, explore a new discipline, or connect with people you don't normally interact with. The Social Library is a great place to borrow a half-an-hour conversation with another community member. The green space surrounding our facilities allow time to slow down, and connect with the indigenous forest gardens of hazelnut, crabapple, devil's club and thimbleberry. There are no cars among the buildings. The Library of the Emotions is a space for information not as some abstracted thing stored somewhere, but information as something inside each one of us, embodied.
Position Objective Keypoints	This position is designed to further the goals of, (1.) developing peer and community emotional literacy; (2.) normalizing climate emotions, including healthy expression; (3.) providing space for folks to reflect on their own embodied feelings around climate; (4.) providing space and programming for communities to form around shared experiences of climate-lives, enabling the collective taking care of each other; (5.) provoking action, experimentation, and hope growing from that embodied place of climate distress (and hope, hopefully).
Duties & Responsibilities	A. PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT 1. You lead a small team to research community ClEmo needs, through interviews and surveys, as well as digital techniques for data collection, such as sentiment analysis. 2. You develop programming that provides the necessary foundation for the discernment, expression, and processing of emotions, behaviours, and thoughts related to climate.

	3. You catalogue the work community members have done in the realm of ClEmo, that is, a library of local knowledge creation (What has worked? How do related projects connect?) B. RELATIONALITY 1. You partner with xʷməθkʷəy̓əm on all projects, furthering their goals as stewards with the land where XMewFu resides as a visitor and guest. 2. You coordinate with the librarians at the Library of the Emotions, as well as the wider XMewFu workforce. Key to XMewFu is the novel approaches that arise when people in different worlds work together and share, thus transdisciplinary is a way of life. 3. You listen to the community members who approach you, always on the look-out for ways people are trying to formulate or express feelings that have affected their lives, but which they may not have words for. 4. You participate in the Social Library conversation loan program. 5. You engage in conversations to bring out the relevant histories, impacts, and hopes of individuals. 6. You check-in with folks as a way to organize collectively. C. MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION 1. You negotiate and develop team expectations for how to show up and pay attention to each other and your endeavours. 2. You manage conflict with non-violent communication, taking breaks when needed. 3. You manage the ceaseless streams of information, suggesting ways to cope, and being cognizant of what others can handle 4. You administer hope when it is available, building resilience and sustenance in your communities slowly and with time. 5. You sweep the floor on days when it is a little dirty. D. PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES 1. You relate to those you interact with based on consent, reciprocity, and care.[4] 2. You stay up-to-date on the latest conversations on emotional labour, emotion research, social change, language habits, climate data, ecological adaptation, and whatever else will come up in a changing world. 3. You have a personal commitment to developing better ways to relate and manage messy hurt. 4. You are willing to hold the inconsistency and contradictions of humans with grace.[5]

Area Hiring Criteria	Education and Experience • Lived experience relating to other human beings (preferred), as well as other creatures. • Completion of a Master's Degree in Library and Information Sciences from an accredited school of Library and Information Science or an approved (ALA/CLA) equivalent. • Certificate of competency allowing you to prescribe PaRx. • Experience and ability to demonstrate organizing emotions effectively, using collective-controlled vocabulary. AffectSafe Level 1 appreciated, but the main point is you are open to learning the fluid language that people use locally in expressing and processing ClEmo. • Two years minimum, sitting with you own feelings surrounding the climate crisis. Skills and Abilities • You are a wetland in the ebb and flow of change, rather than a fully caulked ark.[6] • You are able to listen, showing non-judgment, mirroring, etc. • You have the capacity to slow down. • You know your boundaries, limitations, and areas where you need peer or mentor support. You are able to have frank conversations about the above. • You are able to communicate your needs and what you perceive others to be expressing with gentleness • You sweep the floor with the dedication of artistic creativity • You are able to overlook petty differences, jealousies, and alliances among coworkers, balancing accountability and seeing the best in others. • You show up and stay present with others' vulnerabilities.[7] • You normally take a 1.5 hour lunch break (preferred).
